Quinn might look like "just a toddler," but she's got enough potential to one day change a whole industry—even the world. Dewey is imbedded with potential, too, because it's designed not just for today's professors and students, but for Quinn and her future college classmates as well. Help desks, lecterns, collaborative tables—all ready for technology, ready for new ways of teaching and learning, and ready (about 15 years from now) for Quinn.

loves: swimming, pizza, and helping out on trips to Home Depot career: a bridge builder, in both literal and metaphoric senses

Sure, those are some very cute toddlers, but there's a whole lot more than "cute" going on in their little selves. They have enough potential to one day change a whole industry—even the world.

Dewey's 6-top table is embedded with potential, too, especially when you consider the range of creative minds that will gather around it. Dewey's help desks, lecterns, collaborative tables—all ready for technology, ready for new ways of teaching and learning, and ready (about 15 years from now) for Quinn and Christian.

The future of learning is everywhere

(and according to Christian, it's comfy too)

Grownups used to think you had to be sitting upright, in a straight row of desks, to really learn. Thankfully, children have always understood that the best learning happens everywhere, and now schools and colleges are catching on.

Comfort, conversation and collaboration all go hand-in-hand in relaxed spaces outside of the classroom, and izzy+ has lounge pieces ready to set the stage—for professors and students, for future doctors, app designers and politicians, and (about 15 years from now) for Christian and his classmates.
